

Message on COVID-19 from the Office of the Provost

The Salem University learning community shares the national and world-wide concerns related to the ongoing impact of the Coronavirus (COVID-19). As the events from these unprecedented times continue to develop, we want to assure our students, faculty, staff, alumni and other community stakeholders that we continue to monitor this situation. Based upon governmental directives in West Virginia and the United States Center for Disease Control (CDC), we are continuously putting processes in place to ensure our learning community is safe and that our students continue to academically succeed in their programs of study.

Our response strategies have been timely, collaboratively developed, and clearly communicated to the university community. These plans incorporate continued operations and instruction that are compliant with the Higher Learning Commission, national program accreditors, state licensure bodies, and the NCAA. Plans for prevention based upon recommendations from the CDC and other health agencies have also been put in place. Salem University is committed to continuing the teaching and learning process that includes modified virtual delivery of academic programs to new and existing students. Our goal is to ensure students continue to successfully progress through their academic programs and graduate on time.

If any members of our university community have questions or concerns, please contact Maria Kendall in the Office of the Provost mkendall@salem.edu or (304) 326-1123.
